[From the New York Evening Post.] The beauty of the day on which Mr. Irving's funeral took place, and the charming aspect of the surrounding country, in the glorious sunshine which then closed our long Indian Summer, have prompted the ensuing lines, which we have from the pen of a friend of the departed author, himself eminent in the world of letters:--

SUNNYSIDE .- BY HENRY T. TUCKERMAN The dear, quaint cottage, as we pass, No clambering rose or locusts hide; And dead leaves flock the matted grass-

His own dream-life forever share; He who with England's household grace, And with the brave romance of Spain, Tradition's lore and Nature's face, Imbued his visionary brain;

Mused in Granada's old arcade As gushed the Moorish fount at noon, With the last minstrel thoughtful strayed To ruined shrines beneath the moon

And breathed the tenderness and wit Thus garnered, in expression pure. And now his thoughts with humor flit, And now to pathos wisely lure;

Who traced, with sympathetic hand, Our peerless chieftain's high career; His life, that gladdened all the land, And blest a home-is ended here.

What pensivocharms of nature brood O'er the familiar scene to-day, As if, with smile and tear, she wood Our hearts a mutual rite to pay! The river that he loved so well,
